

Why keep the consumer from expressing a right to copy video for his personal use? Why burden the already struggling HDTV market with millions of additional hardware costs, and punish all early adopters by making them purchase additional hardware? To create a anti-copy system that will be outdated weeks after it is released? It's silly, and all it will do is slow the adoption of HDTV even more, while protecting no one's rights and infringing on others.

Thanks,

Nicholas McClanahan